Read the next part of the story that I've included. I've also added a video of me reading 'Labours 8, 9 and 10' so you can listen to me reading it if you'd prefer to listen to it. Heracles is getting cleverer and cleverer the more tasks he faces. I wonder whether you'd correctly predicted how Heracles would beat the challenge you chose?

Foundation Subject – History

Aileen, the slave. She would have been glad to be able to escape slavery and fight for her freedom. Although it is likely that she'd have died in the battle, she knew she would be dying for a great cause.

Paulinus, the Roman governor. He would have been proud to have won such a magnificent battle and he would be pleased to be honoured by the Emperor. He has won an important victory and become a very famous man.

Milo, the Roman soldier. He would have probably been shocked at the violence of the fighting and might have been frightened at first. But as a soldier who has won a battle, he would be proud of what he had done in the fight for Rome, even though he might not have wanted to fight the Celts since he thought they were nice people.

Rastus, the Roman trader. His life has been disrupted. He has had to run to escape the fighting and war means that no one will want to buy what he has to sell. Many of the people he sells to will have been killed in the battle, and it is unlikely that the Celts will want to buy anything from a Roman trader now. Life will be very different and Rastus might end up a very poor man.

Drest, the Celtic farmer. He enjoys living a peaceful life but knows that he must fight for Boudicca. Even though he is not a warrior, he must go to battle. There is a strong chance that he will die or be severely injured and if not, his life as a peaceful farmer is over now that the Romans rule Britannia.

Boudicca, the Celtic queen. She would have preferred to have continued to live peacefully and rule her people but she knows that she must defend her land against the Romans. She was a fierce warrior and would have been proud to lead her people, even though she died for it. She has been remembered throughout history for her bravery and her resilience.
