

She would sleep quite late the following day. By the time she'd shopped, cooked, laundered, ironed, read a bit of her new book and perhaps visited a neighbour in another hole, the Happy Endings had flown back to the forest like homing pigeons and were hanging from the ancient silver birch all ready for Jub to collect once again.

